The Gentle Art of Base Stealing.

S. Fullerton, the baseball authority, begins a new series of articles. The first article is on the art of base stealing. It is filled with stories and interesting points. Following is a brief extract: "Base stealing, the gentle art of sprinting and hitting the dirt," is the finest drawn and most closely calculated play in baseball and the one that, above all others, reveals the methematical exactitude of the national game. A player who can run eighty-five feet in three and one third seconds from a flat-footed start, ought to reach second base exactly tied with the ball, nine times out of ten starts, if the play is perfectly made by the runner, pitcher, catcher and baseman. The slightest inaccuracy or hestitation decides the play. "It seems a simple matter to run ninety feet while a ball is being thrown sixty-eight feet and caught and thrown back approximately one hundred and thirty-two feet, caught again and held in position to touch the runner. there is art and science in the feat. All pennant winning teams are baserunning teams; every manager urges base running, tries to train his men to it; and then, except in rare instances, refuses to permit them to run, and plays the hit-and-run and sacrifice game instead. "The figures show that the sacrifice hits average about one-third more per season than the stolen bases, and that the hit and run is used sixty per cent. oftener (this in major leagues) than stealing bases. The figures also prove that base stealing succeeds in about six-ty-three per cent, of the times tried, and the hit and run in less than sixtysix per cent., and further that the bit and run results in double plays in albase running, few managers will order a base running attack except when the pitcher opposing his teem is notorlously weak at 'holding up' runners and watch ing the bases."
